2. General description of the Graduate Program in Sociology

The Graduate Program in Sociology is part of the Graduate School of the Australian National University. The University consists of two sections, The Faculties, where both undergraduate teaching and postgraduate training at all levels are conducted, and the Institute of Advanced Studies, comprising several Research Schools, which are responsible for the training of postgraduate students only. In the Institute there is a concentration of sociologists in Demography and Sociology Programs within the Research School of Social Sciences. In the Faculties most sociologists are members of the Sociology Discipline, School of Social Sciences, in the Faculty of Arts. The Graduate School spans the entire university and facilitates the supervision of postgraduate students, drawing on resources throughout the institution.

The Graduate Program has links with the Lifecourse Project, International Survey Project, and the Social Science Data Archive in the Research School of Social Sciences. The program also draws on sociologists in the Centre for Continuing Education, the National Centre for Epidemiology and Population Health, the Public Policy Program, the Urban Research Unit and elsewhere. Closely affiliated with the program are members of the Population Studies and Women's Studies Program.

The Graduate Program in Sociology focuses on social processes and structures in Australia and other industrialised countries, on processes of development in non-Western societies, and on themes in sociological theory. It aims to develop both theoretical and empirical social research skills and to encourage both quantitative and qualitative approaches. Major research fields within the Program include equality of opportunity and relative equity, education in national development, social mobility, social and health policy, gender, ethnic and life cycle inequalities, sociology of health and medicine, social networks, political and social attitudes, immigrants in the labour market, social structure and political relations in Eastern Europe, and sociological theory.

The Australian National University is in close proximity to Federal Parliament, government departments, the headquarters of many national bodies, other national organisations such as the Institute of Criminology and the Australian Bureau of Statistics, and other tertiary institutions including the University of Canberra and the Australian Defence Force Academy.

2. General description of the discipline

Sociology is the larger of the discipline areas within the School of Psychology and Sociology and is one of the most popular discipline areas within the Faculty of Arts, Health and Sciences. Sociologists are based at the Rockhampton, Mackay and Bundaberg campuses. Face-to-face teaching in some units is also available at the regional campuses of Gladstone and Emerald and all units are taught in distance education and mixed modes. Consistent with the regionally-based mission of CQU the sociology program has an applied rural, regional and community focus.

Members of the discipline have been involved in the formation of both the Institute for Sustainable Regional Development, and the Centre for Social Science Research, at Central Queensland University. The Institute - the University's peak research body - is led by Professor Geoffrey Lawrence, the Foundation Chair of Sociology. The Institute has recently been involved in development of full fee paying awards in Sustainable Development and in numerous research studies relating to natural resource management. The Centre for Social Science Research can be reached via the website: www.ahs.cqu.edu.au/rsarc/home.html and the Institute via: www.isrd.cqu.edu.au

2. General description of the discipline:

Tourism Studies at Central Queensland University was developed and is taught primarily by sociologists. The Tourism staff includes five full time staff members and other sessional staff members. Not all members have degrees in sociology. There are two options for studying Tourism - a Bachelor of Tourism and a tourism stream in the MBA program. The teaching of the tourism program adopts an interdisciplinary program of study, which incorporates the concepts, and methods of the social sciences (such as sociology, social psychology, geography) and several business-related disciplines (such as marketing, economics). Both programs of study aim to provide students with knowledge and understanding of the complexity of the tourism industry; multidisciplinary skills for studying tourism and an ability to critically examine the influence and impacts of tourism on contemporary society.

Tourism is available on the university's campuses in Rockhampton and Mackay in full time and part time mode. It is also offered at CQU International campus locations in Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane and Fiji. Tourism may also be studied in the external mode, that is, by correspondence. On-line offerings are currently being negotiated for development. Students who have completed some components of the course have obtained employment in tourism related government departments and agencies and in the private sector.

Further details regarding the Bachelor of Tourism and the MBA (Tourism) entry requirements may be accessed at URL: <http://www.bus.cqu.edu.au>.

2. General description of the department

Charles Sturt University is a multi-campus university with campuses at Albury, Bathurst and Wagga Wagga. Sociologists are located within the Faculty of Arts in the School of Humanities and Social Sciences, Wagga Wagga (7 staff), Albury (1 staff) and the School of Social Sciences and Liberal Studies, Bathurst (8 staff). Each School is multidisciplinary and interdisciplinary research is fostered. The research activities of Sociology staff are directed into two areas. The Riverina campus is the base for the Centre for Rural Social Research. The Mitchell campus specialises in the Sociology of Culture. Students applying to pursue research awards should reflect these interests. Coursework Masters awards are available in Social Welfare and Policy (Riverina) and Criminology (Mitchell).

The Centre for Rural Social Research

The Centre for Rural Social Research is one of four accredited research centres supported by Charles Sturt University. The Centre for Rural Social Research exists to conduct applied interdisciplinary social research which has the potential to benefit rural Australia. The specific objectives of the Centre are to: conduct research into the social conditions of rural Australians; develop social strategies which enhance sustainable development within the Murray-Darling Basin; analyse rural social policy; provide consultancy services; act as a resource for rural health and welfare practitioners; facilitate the publication and dissemination of rural social research; engage in other activities which help to fulfil the above mentioned objectives.

The Centre publishes a number of publications including: Rural Society, a quarterly journal of rural social issues; a monograph series with volumes on Rural Women, Family Farming, Rural Education Issues, Communication and Culture in Rural Areas, and Critical Landcare; an occasional paper series, a technical reports series, and a conference proceedings series; as well as papers in scientific journals and academic books. The Centre maintains a major Web Site containing information, resources, and links to useful sites - <http://www.csu.edu.au/research/crsr/>

The Centre has over 40 members covering a wide range of disciplines and skills. Sociologists are well represented in the Centre. The Director is Associate Prof Margaret Alston (a social worker with a PhD in sociology), and Frank Vanclay is an Associate Professor.

Centre for Cultural Risk

This new centre examines cultural risk and communication in contemporary consumer society. It conducts research into cultural categories most likely to be at risk, such as the poor, the young, older people, and ethnic minority groups, and will examine the involvement of these 'at risk' groups in public, professional and media discourse. In particular, the Centre focuses on three areas of research:

- The mass media in its representation of risk
- The professional cultures of those who deal organisationally with 'at-risk' behaviours (the medical profession, police, courts, schools, hospitals, prisons etc.)
- Those risk cultures which become the 'consumers' of risk, such as women, children, older people, and ethnic minorities

The Centre includes academic staff drawn from a variety of disciplines including cultural studies, communication, health administration, nursing, psychology and sociology. In addition, master and doctoral students studying these disciplines are involved in research conducted by the Centre. The Centre is well situated to attract grants for research into topics such as: risks of ageing, teenage risk (including suicide), food and alcohol disorders, HIV/AIDS communication, domestic violence, victims of crime, and environmental risk.

Further information about the Centre for Cultural Research into Risk may be found on the World Wide Web at <http://www.csu.edu.au/dit/csuhp1.htm>. Contact: The Director, Dr Jane Selby - (02) 6338 4593 (tel); (02) 6338 4401 (fax); email: jsselby@csu.edu.au

2. General description of the department

The Discipline of Sociology and Anthropology is a foundation department of La Trobe University and has twenty-one full-time staff including three Professors. For many years the Department has been the largest Sociology Department in Australia with the biggest number of graduate research students. The Department offers both breadth and depth of scholarship, teaching and research interests. It is a lively, plural and diverse intellectual community with particular strengths in the areas of comparative sociology and ethnographic studies, with special focus on Australia, Asia and the Pacific Rim; research methods; social and cultural theory; gender, family and community studies; social policy and the welfare state; work and technology; anthropology and sociology of religion; and health and illness. Emergent areas of study include globalisation, civilisational theories, divergent and alternative modernities, and cities. Research activities have been enhanced by developing postgraduate seminars in different areas of specialisation and a postgraduate conference at the end of each year. The Department is also home for the renowned international social and political theory journal Thesis Eleven which is published by Sage.

3. Degrees offered

2. General description of department

The focus of the department is the study of industrial and post-industrial societies. It involves the investigation of human groups, communities, institutions and organisations, and the networks of meaning and association which link individuals and groups to the broader social structures of such societies. There is a wide range of subjects at the graduate level which provide opportunities to explore broad theoretical and methodological issues, to acquire research skills, and to develop an understanding of the institutions and processes of industrial and post-industrial society. Emphasis is placed on the research process (the careful description of human social order, the development of theories and research strategies designed to test and apply theories) as the means by which sociology as a discipline advances; and on the development of theoretical ideas to explain social processes. The discipline has a special interest in the application of sociological knowledge to contemporary public issues.

3. Degrees offered

PhD, MA by 100% research. Both are offered full-time or part-time and externally.

MA in Applied Social Research and Postgraduate Diploma of Arts in Applied Social Research. These are coursework degrees which provide graduates with a broad range of research skills for careers in applied social research. These degrees covers qualitative research strategies, survey research and various forms of secondary analysis, issues in public policy, data analysis, computing skills and the conducting of a substantial piece of original research in the form of a group project which is supervised by a number of staff.

MA in Anthropology and Sociology by 66% research. This is a general coursework and research degree.

Masters Qualifying with a research component. This is a program designed for students with a bachelor's degree who want to expand and deepen their knowledge in one or more areas through undertaking coursework and a small research project.

The Masters Qualifying and the MAs are available full-time or part-time, over one, eighteen months or two years.

World Wide Web address: www.tce.rmit.edu.au/ss&p

2. General description of the department

The School of Social Science and Planning offers five undergraduate programs. These are: Bachelor of Social Science, Bachelor of Social Work, Bachelor of Applied Science (Planning), Bachelor of Social Science (Environment) and Bachelor of Social Science (Psychology). Several key courses, especially in first year, are taught in common across the five programs.

A program of four Master of Social Science by coursework specialisations is offered in the School. The individual programs are the Master of Social Science (Policy and Management), Master of Social Science (Environment and Planning), Master of Social Science (International Urban and Environmental Management), and Master of Social Science (International Development). The last two of these programs and some other programs are offered by distance education mode.

The School's major research focus is social policy analysis and evaluation, with particular 'clusters' of expertise on: housing, the policy implications of changes in the relations of work, technology and gender, environment, local government, urban and community locations of policy experience. In addition, there is activity around the broader inquiry and debates about the directions of social and economic policy in Australia and internationally. The overall emphasis is on teaching and research that is topical and focused on the challenge of achieving a fair, equitable and sustainable social and physical environment.

Academic staff in the School are involved with the Centre for Applied Social Research and its research agenda. The RMIT node of the Australian Housing and Urban Research Institute (AHURI) is nested within the School. In addition, the School is home to the journal Just Policy. It is associated with other journals such as Urban Policy and Research, Habitat, and Labour and Industry.

There is a lively postgraduate culture, with over ninety enrolled students, including international students. Postgraduate students may find casual work within RMIT. The School has a commitment to give priority to research students when filing contracts for teaching and research assistance. A postgraduate conference enables research students to give papers on their work during candidature.

3. Degrees offered

2. General description of the Sociology Program

The Sociology Program is a new program at the University of Melbourne. It emphasises linking theoretical and empirical work, and for that reason all core undergraduate subjects taught through the program involve field work as well as theoretical work. Program strengths lie in the areas of the sociology of work and health, sociology of social movements and social problems, and the sociology of the family and sexuality from a cross-cultural perspective. The program offers an internship program, where final year sociology students undertake a piece of sociological research in a workplace context. An honours year was introduced in 1998.

The School of Social Science is in the Faculty of Social and Behavioural Sciences. In both sociology and anthropology/archaeology a core curriculum of theory and methods is available. In addition, a range of electives is offered in both disciplines. Sociology electives include crime and deviance, the criminal justice system, youth and crime, family and households, the media, urban sociology, class, politics, developmental studies, gender, modernity and post-modernity, health, sport and recreation, tourism, multiculturalism and race. The Anthropology/archaeology discipline has a sociocultural and an archaeology/prehistory stream. The sociocultural stream includes electives in the study of Aboriginal, Islander and Melanesian peoples, indigenous peoples in the modern world system, human ecology, material culture studies, linguistic anthropology, medical anthropology, anthropological approaches to law and native title. The archaeology/prehistory stream includes electives in Australasian prehistory, Maya civilisation, hunters and gatherers, heritage and the politics of conservation.

Staff and postgraduate students are actively engaged in various research projects. Sociological research focuses, for example, on immigration, social theory, deviant behaviour, class analysis, women, social policy, third world development, health and illness, child behaviour, urban and regional development, Australian politics, and higher education. Social impact studies focusing on major development projects are also carried out. Anthropological research focuses on Aboriginal and Islander Australia, Melanesia, Native North America and the Philippines as well as on Australian and Meso-American archaeology, development studies, and gender and cultural studies.

2. General description of department

The University of Sydney does not have a Department of Sociology per se. However, there is a division of sociology in the Department of Social Work, Social Policy and Sociology, and a number of sociologists are employed in various departments throughout the University, including in the Faculties of Education, Health Sciences, Medicine, and Nursing. The largest group of sociologists is contained in the Faculty of Health Sciences. The Faculty's Department of Behavioural Sciences teaches both psychology and sociology. All the sociologists in this department include among their research interests the sociology of health.

2. General description of the school

The School of Sociology and Social Work at the University of Tasmania is a cross-campus School combining the disciplines of sociology, social work, and tourism in the Faculty of Arts. The School, located in both the Newnham (Launceston) and Sandy Bay (Hobart) campuses, has over 20 full-time academic staff, of whom all but six are in the sociology discipline.

The School's Discipline of Sociology maintains a commitment to the investigation of theoretical and methodological issues, each of which are regarded as significant elements in the education of graduate students. The School makes a specific effort to help graduate students to develop their quantitative research skills. This commitment is underpinned by technological support base including a Macintosh based local computer network with 35 stations.

The department's three broad areas of interest are: Australian Society, Aboriginal Australia and South-east Asia. Both Anthropology and Sociology are taught in all years at the undergraduate level. Department staff supervise a number of postgraduate research theses in Sociology. Some department staff are themselves currently engaged in research projects which are sociological, including two large ARC funded research projects, one on environmentalism and the other on Australian migration, as well as work on medical sociology. Along with the teaching in the department, these research projects draw on theory and methods (both qualitative and quantitative) in sociology as well as anthropology and cultural studies.

General description of the Centre

2. The Centre for Critical Psychology is an international research and postgraduate centre, which opened in March 1998. It is housed in excellent facilities on the Rydalmere Campus of the University of Western Sydney, on the Parramatta River, close to the centre of Sydney. The Centre has a three-strand research programme, covering aspects of subjectivity, applied ethics and community action research and gender, health and the body. The Centre edits the international Journal of Critical Psychology (Lawrence & Wishart, London) and the Critical Psychology Series (Routledge, London).

Degrees offered

3. MA Critical Psychology

This is a coursework degree in critical psychology and subjectivity as well as an introduction to appropriate research methods. As well as foundation subjects, students are offered a range of subjects, such as critical psychology and popular culture, cyberpsychology and sexuality. Students will also undertake a research project leading to a dissertation. For admission candidates should hold a bachelors degree in psychology, social sciences, cultural studies or an appropriate humanities subject at an acceptable level.

MA (hons) Critical Psychology

This research-based degree offers a research specialism in critical psychology. Students undertake a course in the foundations of theory and research methods in critical psychology and research project leading to the production of a substantial dissertation. For admission see above. Candidates should provide a brief page outline of their proposed dissertation, including theoretical background, research questions and research methods.
