

Theresa Petray has recently completed her PhD at James Cook University in Townsville. Her research focused on Aboriginal activism in North Queensland, particularly the relationship between the social movement and the Australian state. Prior to enrolling at JCU, Theresa earned a BA with Honours at St Lawrence University in upstate New York. Theresa discovered her love of sociology at St Lawrence and took advantage of several opportunities for sociological research while an undergraduate student, including a study of the sex industry in Chiang Mai, Thailand, and her honours research into a Rastafarian community in Shashamene, Ethiopia. Theresa's research interests are social inequalities and social change.
